WHY · THE PROBLEM

Standups don’t end. They just stop.

No owner

Nothing owns the ending

Calendars can shorten meetings. They can’t end them. The call spills straight into the next one, and people carry it with them.

EEG

The switch is where strain builds

Microsoft WorkLab’s EEG study found stress building when one meeting ends and the next begins (14 people: directional, not proof).

1 line

A written next step helps

Leroy & Glomb: writing a plan for unfinished work reduces the attention carried into the next task.

Viraam does not claim to reduce stress. Its evidence page states exactly what the research supports and what it does not.

A shared close the whole team does together

The last 2½ minutes of a meeting the team already holds. One link in the invite, everyone starts together, nothing to run.

Guided reset

A few gentle, seated moves that change by weekday, with optional rain or stream sound.

One line: next step

Everyone leaves with their next step written down.

Nothing to adopt

One link. No install, no login, no personal data. English, Hindi and Marathi.

Four moments, one link

1

Once

Paste one line into the standup invite (Google, Outlook or WhatsApp). Set up in a minute.

2

Daily

At the end, everyone taps the link and starts together. Seated, camera off. The link hosts it, not the lead.

3

Overrun

If the standup ran over, the close shortens itself so the meeting still ends on time.

4

Friday

One line to the lead: how many days it ran. Never who. Teams under 10 are hidden.

Built for one meeting: the daily internal standup

When it runs

At the end of the same recurring internal meeting: daily standups, pod syncs, ops huddles. Same 6 to 10 people, same time, every day.

Who it is for

Team leads decide and run it. HR sponsors it. Team members take part, and anyone can skip.

Deliberately out of scope

Client calls, partner calls and ad-hoc cross-team reviews. A ritual only sticks where the same group meets every day; forcing it on external calls adds social friction and muddies the weekly “days run” count.

THE BUSINESS CASE

Cheap to try, easy to measure

COST TO TRY

One link, zero integration, no personal data. One team can pilot it in a week.

VALUE

Standups end on time, and everyone leaves with their next step written.

HOW IT IS MEASURED

One number: days the close ran this week. Counts only, never names.

Built and testable today: Live product in 3 languages (EN, HI, MR) · 100 automated tests · Self-shortening close for overrunning standups · Team-level counts only, never names · Evidence page grading every claim · Launched on Product Hunt, Peerlist and Reddit

What launch taught

Practitioner replies pointed to the team lead's buy-in and an explicit opt-out as what drives adoption, not features. Next step: one real team, one week.
